

Andréa Hardaway

Author Bio

Andréa Hardaway was born in Memphis, Tennessee. She graduated from Millington Central High School, where she was active in the Creative Writing Club and yearbook. In 2018, she completed her bachelor's degree in psychology. In 2019, she published her first fiction book (That Girl), which was heavily based on her college experience and discovering her purpose. Afterwards, she went on to publish three more fiction books and a poetry book while also earning her master's in computer information systems at Christian Brothers University. Her website that was started in 2019 also includes her published blog with posts on various lifestyle topics. Recently, she was featured in The Millington Star, a local newspaper, for her work as an author, and she was interviewed on 88.5 for Micheal Adrian Davis's Author Spotlight on November 9th.

Book Bio

People often reminisce about their first kiss, first date, or even their first love; however, college junior Nastasha Lincoln begins a fall semester as a transfer student hoping to have those first experiences for herself. As she grows accustomed to attending a new school, she must deal with the temptations and pressures that plague most young adults' minds: partying, schoolwork, romantic relationships, and a career. In the midst of it all, Nastasha also struggles with staying true to her morals and faith in God.

Eventually, the trials and tribulations she faces in college will not compare to the blessings God has for her years down the road. Even though she is not popular or considered the "it girl," Natasha still dons the persona of that girl that people often overlook, but in the end, God rewards her for her faithfulness and love for Him. Thus, this story details how Natasha deals with balancing a social life, school, and work while discovering her life's purpose.